was drowned on Thursday afternoon under the following circumstances. He was in bathing off Fish Island with three companions as were likewise several smaller boys. PERKINS discovered that two of the smaller boys were struggling in the water, and immediately put out to rescue them, and it was in this act of true heroism that the young man lost his own life. A ferryman in one of Morrison's skiffs likewise discovered the perilous position of the two small boys, and hastened with the skiff to their assistance in which they were taken up. The ferryman did not suppose PERKINS to be drowning, as he gave no alarm and therefore no assistance was rendered. The body of PERKINS was not recovered til Saturday when it was found at the fishing ground on the dyke leading to Patroon Island. An inquest was held by Coroner WITBECK of this Village the jury rendering a verdict of accidental drowning.
